I came to Japan with my Ghanaian husband four years ago and have a 3-year-old child. I am not working. Recently my husband is cold and sometimes yells me to go out. Can I get welfare?

You cannot use welfare to make up quarrel. You should talk with your husband to solve the problem. You should find a job and work in case of emergency and you'd better change your status of residence from a family stay visa to a permanent resident visa.

The livelihood protection system is basically for Japanese citizens. Only permanent residents, long-term residents, Japanese spouses, spouses of permanent residents, and persons who have been recognized as refugees can receive welfare benefits. Let's learn Japanese on a regular basis so that you can get a job and live by yourself. If you continue to receive welfare, there may be difficulty in renewing your visa, even if you are long term residents.

I'm having trouble in paying rent. I want to apply for prefectural housing or municipal housing.

Requirements for moving in those housings are that: you should have an address or work place in the prefecture, your total income of all households should be 158000 yen or less per month, you must not have unpaid prefectural tax and municipal tax, and you should have alien registration and status of residence.

Public housing has various restrictions differing from private rental housing. Let's study Japanese well so that you can answer the questions of the person in charge properly.
